Radical plan for new look Adelaide

A sweeping report on the future of Adelaide has recommended a major new tram network, development of Elizabeth and Norlunga as major regional centres and new housing developments in inner suburbs.

The plan for the next 30 years also calls for the renewal of established industrial areas at Woodville and Edwardstown, and concentrating major industrial development in the north-west corridor from Technology Park to Port Adelaide.

The Planning Review, also known as the Planning Review, released by the State Government yesterday, outlines a new north-south railway, but recommends upgrading the north-south rail link between Elizabeth, Norlunga and Woodville.

STAGGERING an extension of the Glenelg tramline to the Adelaide Railway Station with branch lines to Norwood, North Adelaide, Prospect and the proposed Mile End redevelopment.

ENHANCING the future of the Barossa Valley and the South-east Valley and further control to protect the Blue Farm zone and the Adelaide Parklands.

RECOMMENDING construction of 2100 new houses in "high-quality estates" on the Adelaide Parklands.

CALLS for the restriction of new development along the arterial roads. In future, it is proposed that development will be restricted to regional centres.

SAYS a new development authority should be introduced to State Parliament in a bid to improve decision making and to ensure that "work in the interests of the state".

PROPOSES that local councils have the primary role in handling planning and development applications with a much-simplified "one-stop" system.

A new, informal "development authority" will be set up with special judges and recommendations to handle all development and planning decisions.

RECOMMENDS a coastal regional park with major recreational facilities where it crosses the Cornish River park.

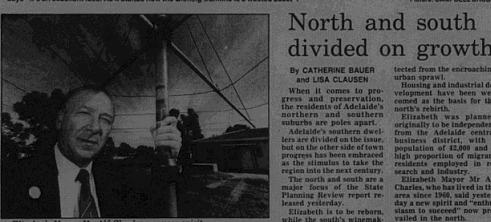

It also proposes strengthening Glenelg's recreational and tourism role.

REPORTS the retention and development of metropolitan areas.

RECOMMENDS a new tram network, development of Elizabeth and Norlunga as major regional centres and new housing developments in inner suburbs.

Everything old is new again. Under Planning Review recommendations the Glenelg tramline could be extended to the Adelaide railway station with branch lines to Norwood, North Adelaide, Prospect and Mile End. And Barry Fox, a tram operator at the St Kilda Tramway Museum, says "it is an excellent idea. As it stands now the Glenelg tramline is a wasted asset".

$3-an-hour youth wage in Lib plan

From Chief Political Writer LINDSEY OLNEY
 SYDNEY: A youth wage of $3 an hour would be introduced by a Coalition government under a new policy to tackle Australia's youth job crisis.

The Opposition Leader, Dr Hewson, outlined several new policy additions at a Liberal rally in Sydney yesterday. — In fact ways of increasing places and helping the under-25s to find work.

The youth wage would be slightly higher than present rate and would be available to young people and their employers under voluntary employment agreements.

A DOUBLING of the $20 million a year contained in the plan to assist voluntary welfare agencies that would be required to take over a large amount of unemployed assistance work now done by government agencies.

THE FORMATION of a Department of Sustainable Development to speed up environmental, Aboriginal and heritage assessments of development proposals, imposing a deadline on such studies and giving projects the go-ahead if such studies are not completed on time.

But the scheme was condemned by the ACTU, whose secretary, Mr Bill Kelly, branded it last night an "insult" to young people which would not create more jobs but simply high-paid workers with cheaper labor.

Dr Hewson said employers would not pay untrained young people full adult wages — of around $13 an hour — and youth wage was essential to cut the high rate of youth unemployment, 31 per cent nationally and close to 50 per cent in South Australia and Victoria.

It is expected a training wage proposal will be adopted at the Government's jobs summit on July 22, under which employers would pay staff only for the time spent in productive work, while the Government would pay for time spent in training.

But he said there was a danger of shifting the unemployment problem to middle-aged workers and that such changes would have to be made before any junior wage could be introduced.

United Trades and Labor Council secretary Mr John Lewis said a youth wage would be "false economics" and would create an underclass of workers who could be exploited.

"It is not the level of youth wages causing youth unemployment but the very fact that the positions young people hold in the past don't exist any more," he said.

North and south divided on growth

By CATHERINE BAUER and LISA CLAUSEN
 When it comes to progress and preservation, the residents of Adelaide's northern and southern suburbs are poles apart.

Adelaide's southern dwellers are divided on the issue, but on the other side of town progress has been embraced as the stimulus to take the region into the next century.

The north and south are a far cry from each other, says the State Planning Review report released yesterday.

Elizabeth is to be reborn, while the south's viticultural districts will be protected.

Tony's on the ball for in the big clash

■ Brave South Australia's Tony McGuinness (pictured) will win for The Advertiser on the State-of-Origin clash with Victoria at Football Park tomorrow night.

■ The Adelaide Crows vice-captain, who has been sidelined with a hamstring injury, will play in his first game in tomorrow's paper.

■ He will analyse the strengths, style and vulnerable areas in both players' teams, tell how the players really line up and compare the coaching approach of the SA's Graham Cornes and Victoria's Billy O'Connell.

■ After the game, McGuinness will be in the SA rooms to recount at the Advertiser.

LONDON: Andre Agassi won the Wimbledon men's singles final early today (SA time), his first Grand Slam tennis tournament win at his fourth attempt.

Agassi beat eighth seeded Croatian Goran Ivanisevic 6-7 (6), 6-4, 6-4, 7-6 (4). The American was the first man to win a Wimbledon

Revealed: Nazi war diaries

LONDON: The diaries of Adolf Hitler's propaganda chief, Joseph Goebbels, have been stolen after more than 80 years, detailing for the first time the Nazi regime's attack on Jews.

Goebbels wrote in the diaries of "Kristallnacht", the night in November 1938 when many Jewish homes and businesses were attacked. "The sky is blood red," the synagogue is burning.

The diaries were discovered by a historian in Moscow's Central Government Archives. Their authenticity has been confirmed by the writer's friend and expert on Goebbels, the German historian Ralf Fudrich.

The Sunday Times in London, which is preparing to publish the diaries, said yesterday they revealed how Goebbels described giving Hitler the first news of the German victory in the Battle of Britain. "He (Hitler) decrees the demonstration should go ahead. It is for the Jews but the wrath of the people. That's right. Give the instructions to the police and the party."

The paper said the diaries included Goebbels' account of the Russian crisis leading up to Hitler's meeting with Neville Chamberlain, the then British Prime Minister, and the outbreak of war in 1939, the purge of the Jewish population in the "Long Night" in 1941, Hitler's reaction to the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor and the failed plot to kill him.

Agassi takes Wimbledon title

LONDON: Andre Agassi won the Wimbledon men's singles final early today (SA time), his first Grand Slam tennis tournament win at his fourth attempt.

Agassi beat eighth seeded Croatian Goran Ivanisevic 6-7 (6), 6-4, 6-4, 7-6 (4). The American was the first man to win a Wimbledon final from the number 12 seed.

Agassi had lost his previous three Grand Slam tournament finals, one at the US Open and twice at the French Open.

Croatian Goran Ivanisevic matched a tight first set in a tie-break but Agassi immediately fought back in the second game of the second set, breaking Ivanisevic's serve and held on to even the match at 7-6 (4), 6-4, 6-4.

As the grey skies above Wimbledon began to clear, Agassi started to come to life with Federer's steady serve.

The match between the two Las Vegas took control of the match when he obtained and early break in the in the opening game of the third set and the failed plot to kill him.
